

TEMPLE

Build a self the noise can't move

SCOTT STOJETZ

CONTENTS

SEVEN COLUMNS

BEFORE THE FIRST CHAPTER ABOUT THE AUTHOR

I Look Up
THE OPENING

II Integrity
PRACTICE 1 — EXAMINE

III The Build
PRACTICE 2 — PAUSE

IV Standing
PRACTICE 3 — STAND

V Organizing
PRACTICE 4 — ORGANIZE

VI Serving
PRACTICE 5 — SERVE

VII The Throughline
PRACTICE 6 — ACCOUNT

Written in loving appreciation for my guru, Paramahansa Yogananda.

A bubbling cauldron of suffering souls.
A green field of material gain.
One view wants to fill the holes.
The other, the panorama of the insane.

CHAPTER ONE OF SEVEN

LOOK UP

Stop.
Look up.
Look around.

THE WALK PAST OURSELVES

We are the most advanced and remarkable species on earth, and most of us have spent the last decade looking down at our hands. Our phones know us better than our spouses do. Our feeds know what makes us angry, what makes us afraid, what makes us spend, and they have been quietly using all three to keep us scrolling. We have agreed to this. We have not been forced. The agreement was easier than the alternative, so we made it, and most of us made it without noticing we were making anything at all.

This is the cultural condition of America in the present hour. We are a population of distracted humans, herded into compliance by a constant deluge of information designed not to inform us but to keep us reactive. Our political life is a long tantrum across two colors. Our economic life is a sustained pressure to consume what we cannot afford. Our civic life, what is left of it, is the residue of those two pressures — the people we used to know now reduced to the colors they wear and the brands they post about. We are not unified. We have been carefully made not to be.

We have also lost our bodies. Not in any single dramatic way. Slowly. We sit longer than humans have ever sat. We move less than humans have ever moved. We eat what is convenient and call the convenience freedom. We sleep with our screens and wonder why our minds will not quiet. We feel, in the body itself, the cost of the way we have agreed to live, and most of us have stopped listening to what the body is telling us. We medicate the symptoms. We push through. We say we are fine.

We are not fine. The country is not fine. And the work of becoming fine — for ourselves, for our families, for the country — is not going to be done by the people who broke the country. It is going to be done by us. The ones reading sentences like this one, alone, somewhere, with the suspicion that we have been part of a long drift and the willingness to consider that we might be the ones to interrupt it.

🏛 THREE WAYS WE HAVE BEEN MADE SMALL

It is tempting to describe what has happened to American character as a single condition — distraction, division, materialism, take your pick. That description is not wrong, but it is too flat. What has actually happened is that the same cultural pressure has produced three distinct conditioned responses, and most of us are operating out of one of them without knowing it.

The first conditioning is high performance. The reader trained into this mode is climbing — outworking, outsmarting, outearning, getting there first, taking what is theirs and a little more. The world is an open market for their advancement. Other people are obstacles, instruments, or competition. Rest feels like falling behind. Stillness feels dangerous. The high-performance person is often admired by the culture, which is part of the trap. The culture rewards the very behavior that is reducing them.

The second conditioning is scarcity. The reader trained into this mode is run by a single engine — not enough. Not enough money, not enough status, not enough ground beneath their feet, not enough cushion against the next loss. The engine produces two very different-looking people, and the culture treats them oppositely while missing that they are running on the same fuel. The visible scrambler — envious, jealous, coveting, scheming — gets pitied. The high-functioning operator — intelligent, disciplined, often in leadership, often successful by every metric the culture measures — gets celebrated. Both are scarcity-driven. Both are unscrupulous, in different registers. The scrambler grifts what they can. The operator earns at the expense of others by design — the deal that hollows out a competitor, the policy that prioritizes the quarter over the people, the leadership that holds values until values become expensive. The scarcity engine cannot conceive of abundance, so it cannot stop. The trap of this mode is that the culture puts the high-functioning version on a pedestal and never sees the engine underneath. Wall Street rewards it. Corporate cultures reproduce it. Pitied or celebrated, scarcity is reducing both versions of the person inside it.

The third conditioning is inertia. The reader trained into this mode is sitting — doing nothing for themselves, doing nothing for the common good, scrolling, watching, half-asleep through hours that will not come back. The inert person is invisible to the culture, which suits the culture fine. A population sitting on its couch is not a population that organizes. The inert person is often, underneath, a person in pain — a person who tried and was hurt and decided not to try anymore. The culture cost them their movement, and now the lack of movement costs them their life.

These are not three kinds of people. They are three modes the same person rotates through across a week, sometimes across a single day. The high performer crashes into inertia on Sunday. The inert person is grasping when they finally rouse. The scarcity-bound person performs hard when the right room is watching. The trick of the conditioning is that we keep moving between the three and never notice that all three are pulling us downward. The work of this book is to climb, deliberately, out of all three, into a fourth posture the conditionings do not recognize and the culture does not reward — the posture of a self that is being built on purpose.

WHAT WE STOP SEEING

The cost of these three conditionings is not only what they do to us. It is what they make us blind to.

People in mass are being wiped from the earth while we sit by in ignorance and separative delusion. Millions of humans in need are being dismissed away as unimportant afterthoughts. Bound to material gain, we do not view relational dynamics correctly. We care less. The high performer cannot afford to see, because seeing would slow the climb. The scarcity-driven person cannot afford to see, because seeing requires the energy they have already committed to grievance. The inert person cannot afford to see, because seeing would require movement.

This is the moral cost of conditioned smallness. Not just the personal damage. The blindness. The world fills with suffering and we scroll past it because we have been trained to. The stranger in our city goes uncared for. The neighbor we used to know is now a colored avatar. The faraway war is a notification. The face in the mirror is a face we are barely on speaking terms with.

The people across the aisle are not the enemy. The enemy is the engineered division that has us treating them as the enemy. The migrants at the border are not the enemy. The enemy is the manipulation that has us pointing at them instead of at the systems that profit from our pointing. The young men shooting up schools are not the enemy. They are the symptom of the enemy. The enemy is the cultural pressure that produced them and the moral abdication that allows the pressure to continue.

None of this is news. Every reader who has picked up this book already knows it. What is harder to say, and what this book is going to spend its remaining pages saying in many different ways, is that we are accountable. Not the politicians. Not the platforms. Not the billionaires. Us. The agents of change in America must be moral agents — individuals holding themselves to the strictest codes of right and wrong. That sentence is the entire premise of this book. If we are not willing to hold ourselves accountable, no political party, no economic reform, no policy victory will produce the country we say we want. The country is the sum of how its citizens behave through their oscillations. Right now its citizens are oscillating badly. The fix is also behavioral, and the work of fixing it begins where you are sitting.

🏛 THE TWO EGOS

Before we go any further, a distinction has to be made, because everything that follows in this book depends on it.

There are two egos in the work ahead of us, and most readers have never been taught to tell them apart. The first is the ego we inherited — the conditioned ego, the one the culture shaped, the one that runs the high performer and the scarcity-driven schemer and the inert scroller without any of them knowing they are being run. The second is the ego we are going to deliberately build — the good ego, the one assembled on purpose from materials we have chosen, the one a temple is made of. Most contemplative traditions teach the dissolution of ego, full stop. This book teaches something different and more useful for an American reader. A badly-formed ego is the enemy. A deliberately built ego is exactly what we want. You are not being asked to erase yourself. You are being asked to take apart the inherited self and build a better one in its place.

When this book speaks of the ego that reduces us, it is speaking of the inherited one. When it speaks of the ego we are building, it is speaking of the good one. Hold those two apart in your reading, and the work will make sense.

🏛 THE INHERITED EGO REDUCES US

There is a story Americans have been told about the inherited ego, and it is the wrong story.

The story says this ego is what makes a person big. Confident. Successful. The hustle ego, the self-made ego, the brand ego, the swagger. The culture sells the inherited ego as inflation — I am bigger than I was, I am bigger than you are, I am building something.

That is the trick. The inherited ego does not inflate us. It reduces us. It cuts us down to a smaller version of ourselves and dresses the smaller version in the costume of largeness so we do not notice the loss. The high performer reduced by ego cannot rest, cannot lose, cannot be wrong, cannot be tired without secretly hating themselves for the tiredness. The scarcity-bound person reduced by ego cannot be generous, cannot be glad for someone else, cannot be content with what they have. The inert person reduced by ego cannot move, cannot try, cannot risk one more failure on top of the failures already accounted for.

In every case the inherited ego is doing the same thing. It is making us smaller and telling us we are larger. It is shrinking the field of what we are capable of feeling, capable of seeing, capable of being. The culture profits from this reduction. A small person is a predictable consumer, a reliable voter for whichever side has frightened them most recently, a faithful scroller. The smaller we are, the more useful we are to the systems that have an interest in our smallness.

🏛 THE GOOD EGO IS WHAT WE BUILD

The sentence to absorb before we close this chapter is the affirmative thesis of the book. It names what we are building in place of what we are taking apart.

Habits, commitments, goals, devotions, values —
together form our disposition, our demeanor, our personality;
our good ego.

You already have all of these materials. You have habits. You have commitments. You have goals. You have devotions, even if you do not call them that. You have values. The question this book will press, again and again, is whether you have chosen them or whether they were chosen for you. Whether you have arranged them deliberately or whether they have piled up. Whether the ego they are building is the inherited one that has been reducing you, or the good one you are going to build in its place.

WE ARE TEMPLES, OR WE CAN BE

There is a metaphor that will run through the rest of this book, and it is worth introducing now, plainly. We are temples. Not in some abstract spiritual sense, though the metaphor borrows from spiritual sources older than this country. In the practical sense: we are constructed things. The question is not whether we are constructed. The question is whether we are constructed deliberately or by accident.

Most of us have been constructed by accident. We accepted what was given. The political identity our family wore. The professional ambition our peers measured us against. The consumer reflexes our screens trained into us. The opinions we acquired by absorption, the habits we acquired by drift, the personality we acquired by default. We did not choose these. We received them, and we have been operating under their influence for so long that we mistake them for ourselves.

Temple culture is the practice of taking that inherited self apart and rebuilding it on purpose. It is a slow practice. It is a daily practice. It is not a spiritual path in the denominational sense — you do not need to belong to anything, you do not need to know any vocabulary, you do not need any teacher except the honest version of yourself. What you need is the willingness to look at what you have been and the discipline to choose, deliberately, what you are going to be next.

THE FIRST TEMPLE

The metaphor is also literal. The body is the first temple — first in the sense that it is the one you wake up in, the immediate one, the structure carrying you through this day. What it carries is what makes it a temple at all.

Bone, muscle, breath, blood, tissue, the heart that has not stopped since before you were born. The teaching is older than this country, older than most religions, and it is consistent across the wisdom traditions that have looked carefully at the human condition. The body is the field where the practice happens. The body is the vessel that carries something larger than itself. The body is the structure through which character is expressed. Chapter 3 will return to this in full.

We live in a culture that has gotten the body deeply wrong. Two errors, both spiritual. The first error treats the body as a machine to be optimized, displayed, photographed, compared — the body as project. The second error treats the body as background noise, a distraction from the real work — the body as forgotten luggage. Both errors miss the same thing. The body is neither a project nor a distraction. It is the temple. The reverence the title of this book points to begins here, in how you treat the structure that is carrying you through this day.

This book is not going to give you a fitness program. There are other books for that. What this book is going to do, throughout, is hold the body as present to the work. When we talk about standing in social weather in a later chapter, the body is what stands. When we talk about pausing before reaction, the body is what pauses — the breath catches, the shoulders drop, the jaw releases. When we talk about serving with presence, the body is what shows up. When we talk about the daily account, the body is part of what gets accounted for. Did I sleep enough to be useful today? Did I eat with reverence or with anxiety? Did I move my body, or did I sit still and call it work?

Take what you need. Take no more. Treat what you take with respect. That is the discipline, in one line. Chapter 3 will say more.

🏛 THE PILLARS, THE PRECONDITIONS, THE PRACTICES

There are three pillars that uphold a temple of self-culture. The Foundational pillar names what you build with — self-examination, conviction, integrity, sacrifice, purpose. The Organizational pillar names how you arrange the build — commitments, routines, the circle of trust, the daily mechanics of staying honest. The Action pillar names how you live the build out in the world — service, presence, the elevation of every interaction. The mortar that holds them in place is personal integrity. The architect, in every case, is you.

Before any of that work begins, two things have to be true.

The first is that you have to know what you are doing. Not in any expert sense — you do not need credentials or vocabulary. In the discriminating sense. You need the kind of knowing that can tell good materials from bad, true motive from false, what is real about your day from what you have been telling yourself about your day. Most of us were never taught this. Information was the substitute. Information is not the same thing.

The second is that you have to know whose approval the build is for. Most of us answer that question wrong without knowing we are answering it. We say we are building lives that will satisfy us, and what we are actually building is lives that will satisfy the room. The room shifts as we age, but it never goes away unless we deliberately tell it to. The temple cannot be built for the room. The room changes. Today's room praises what tomorrow's room mocks. The only stable foundation is internal — built for something inside you that does not move when the room moves.

These two preconditions — discriminating knowledge and inner self-validation — are what Chapter 3 will open with. They are the soil the build rises from. Without them, what follows is performance. With them, what follows is work.

The work itself unfolds across the chapters as architecture, and at the close of each chapter as a daily practice. Six practices in total — Examine, Pause, Stand, Organize, Serve, Account. Six verbs, each small enough to begin tomorrow morning, each large enough to rebuild you. They are not the homework at the end of the chapters. They are the moves of seeing the world correctly. Pause and look up is how you see the panorama. Examine is how you see your own face inside the cauldron. Stand is how you do not get pulled under. Organize is how the day takes its true shape. Serve is what you do once you can see. Account is how you keep going when no one is watching.

THE HAND-OFF

You are accountable. You are the agent. The choice belongs to you, and so do the consequences. Most of us have never been told this clearly. You have just been told it. What you do with it is yours.

The next chapter is about integrity. About the still point at the center of a life that has stopped being moved by everything that wants to move it. About what integrity is, what it costs, what it gives back, and the small daily work of keeping it sound. The chapter ends with the first of the six practices — Examine — which is where the build actually begins.

For now, this is the only assignment.

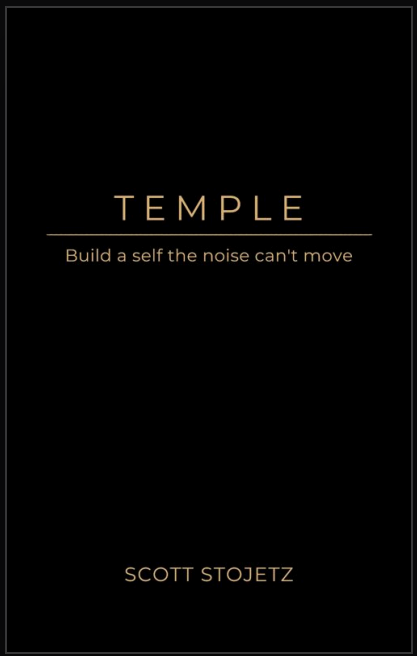
Stop.

Look up.

Look around.

Get to work.

↑ CONTENTS



END OF THE FREE SAMPLE

Continue reading

You have reached the end of the free sample of Temple. The complete interactive edition, with the formatted PDF, is yours for $12.95.

CONTINUE READING

fightingtobekind.com